Since 2019 the global population have been subjected to an unprecedented social control system. Deployed under the mantle of public health, many of the liberties and freedoms that the military industrial complex vowed to maintain through the auspices of the 'War on Terror', have been put to one side. This is not the first time that humanity has been subject to the ethically ambiguous directives of mass social engineering.

The wearing of face masks by way of an effort to control the spread of the Covid-19 pandemic, came under great scrutiny. The counter intuitive messages being repeated daily by the medical advisories and the authorities played into the suspicions of many critical thinkers. Ultimately the logic was quite profoundly flawed. When taken to task on many of these points, the general response from the UK science advisory was one of:

> We will continue to make recommendations based on scientific advice that is likely to do good.

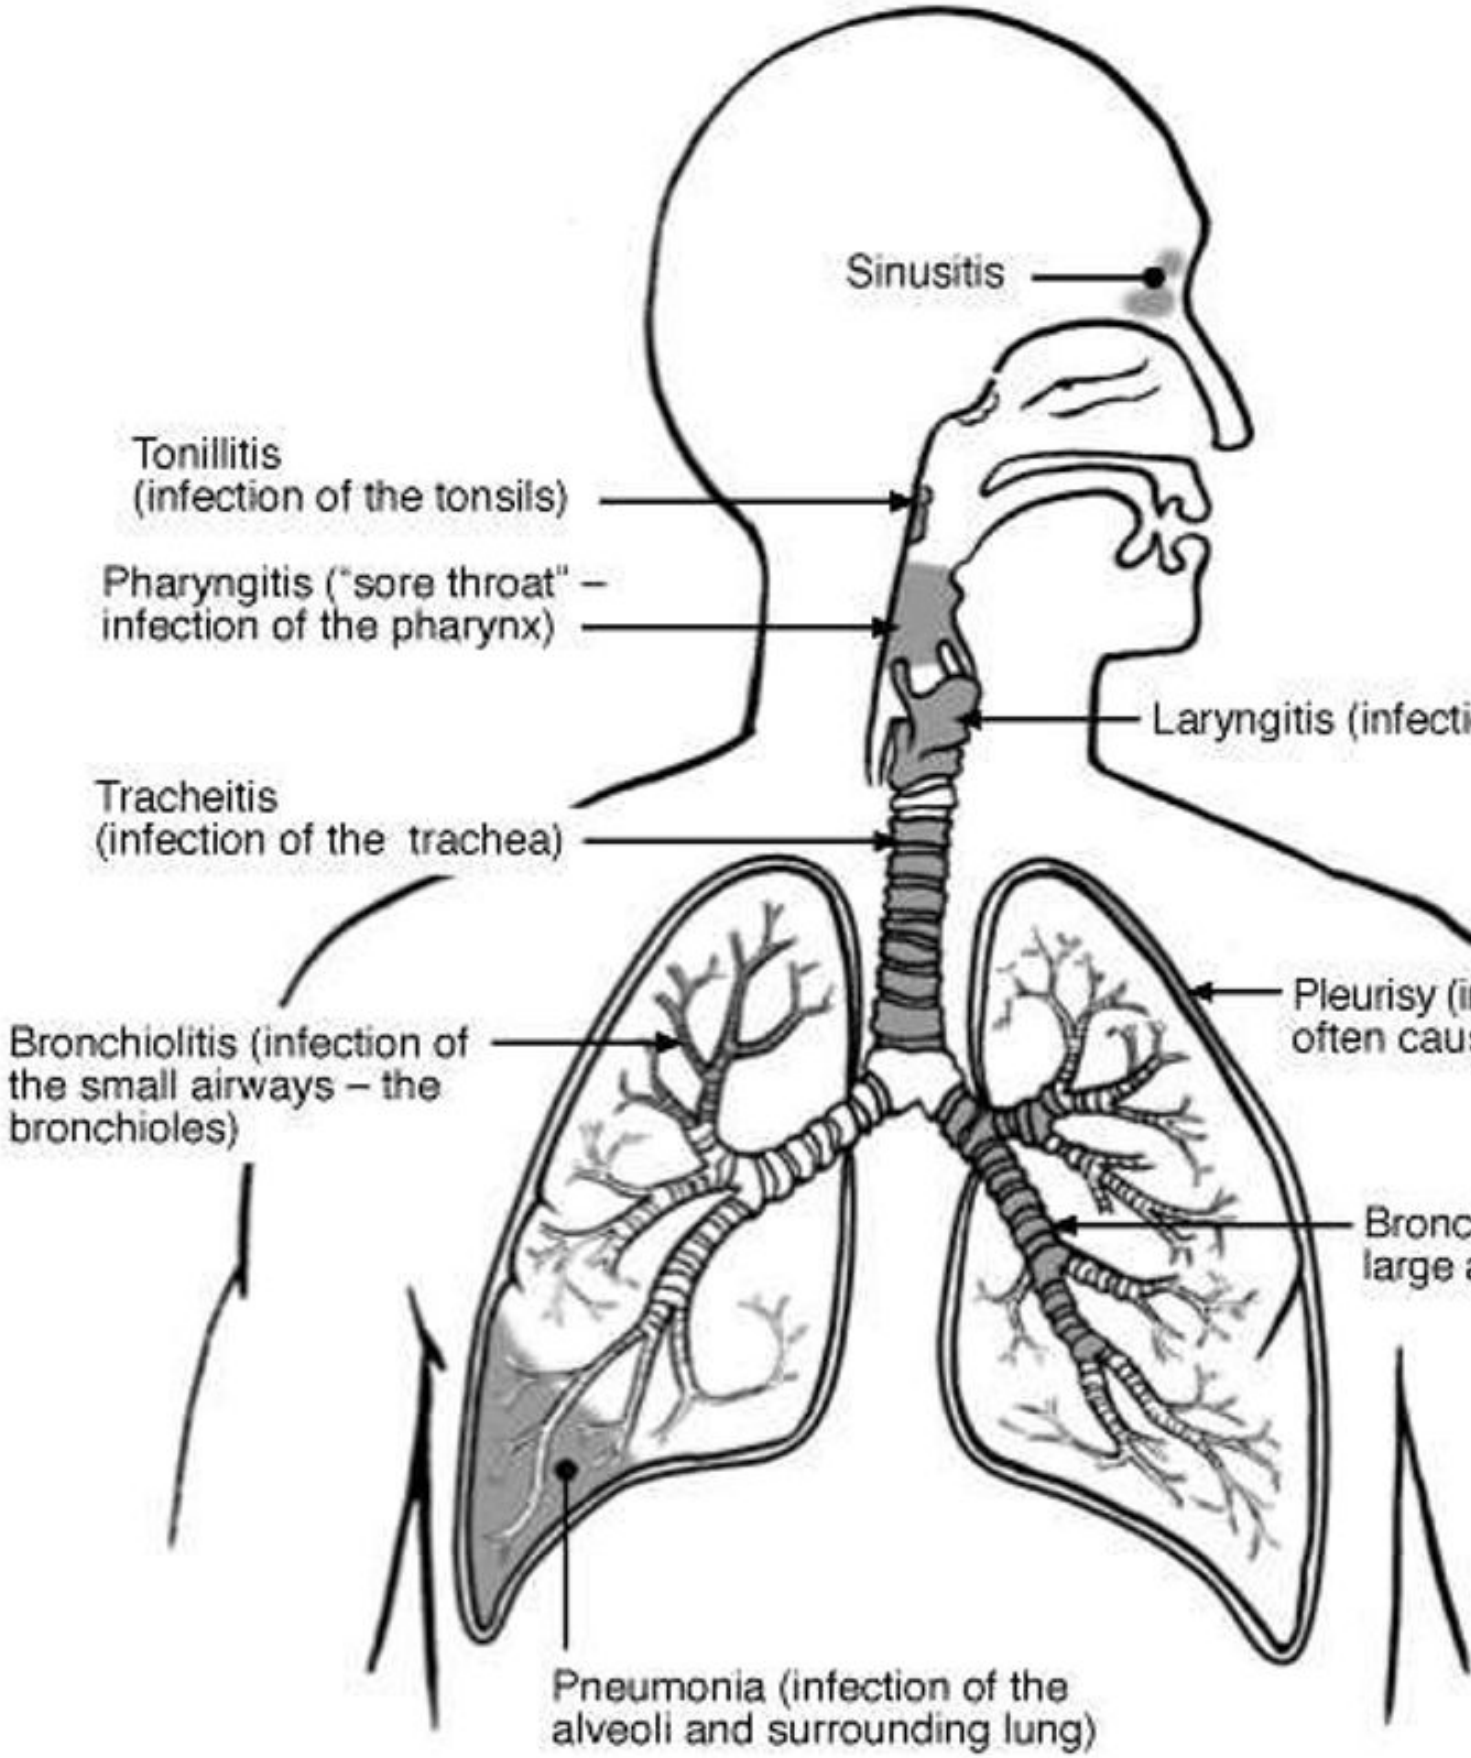

While this statement appears to be in the interests of those compelled to cover their faces, it's fairly riddled with inconsistency:

The word 'recommendations' implies that the directive is not proven fact, but neither is it intended to be treated as optional requirement being requested by an overly paranoid nanny state. It is delivered in such a way as to appear as an authoritarian directive, borrowing the authority of the official source delivering it. The qualifier of 'likely to do good' is just straight up semantic gymnastics. Likely according to whom and good for what? In this scenario the bodies asserting that masks were likely to do good were not the W.H.O or the various virologists working in healthcare. It very much appears to have been an agenda serving narrative, cooked up by faceless politicos.

Opinions began to emerge that masks were (and continue to be) potentially counter productive in terms of long term risk to bronchial integrity. The re-inhalation of Co2 and dental bacteria can not be considered (in any way) hazard free. Dental bacteria is designed by nature to be particularly virulent. The entire point of them being in your mouth is to attack and kill any other forms of bacteria invading the mouth, before they travel into the digestive tract or lungs. As with most systems found in nature, there is a careful balance in operation. Many people have experienced random mutations in their dental bacteria in the form of halitosis, abscesses and even tonsillitis or strep throat infections. In many cases this has not occurred as a result of foreign invasions by external bacteria, but simply by way of an anomalous shift in the balance of highly complex bacteria present in the mouth.

Infections of the respiratory tract

To assume that these bacteria aren't that harmful because they're contained in saliva and as a result must surely not be overly poisonous, would be an error. Instances of unchecked infections from dental cavities have required that patients have no option but to have a lung removed. Forcing these potentially hazardous bacteria back through airways into the bronchial system can in no way be guaranteed 'to be doing good'. In addition, the many manufacturers of 'fashion masks' clearly print on the packaging or labels that these cloth masks are not to be considered as clinical protection. Which raises the question of what exactly they are to be considered as. It has always been the opinion of TEFLONRABBIT that the mask mandate was primarily concerned with eroding trust among the population. Whether the widespread wearing of surgical masks prevented any spikes in epidemiology statistics is quite difficult to measure.

In the article 'The Great Precept' the subject of global currency failure indicates that there may be related motivations behind the confusing messages being delivered during the pandemic. The analysts predicting major currency collapse as a result of the 2008 financial collapse, were unreserved in their recommendations. Advice was totally uncompromising and verging on alarmist fearmongering. Individuals who had spent a decade or more providing consultation to bodies such as The Pentagon were openly stating that people should be seriously considering a move to more remote communities. Simply packing up and heading out into the wilds was not the limits of their prepper orientated directives. Many of them went into extensive detail regarding;

- Establishing sources of fresh water on the property
- Limiting road access to the accommodation
- Installation of sustainable energy sources and or generator backups
- Setting up agricultural means of self sufficiency
- Transferring any emergency funds into gold
- Stockpiling food, fuel, consumables and ammunition
- Planning for extensive periods without the rule of law

While there has always been a tangible percentage of the population who exhibit traces of paranoia in their prepper mentality, these recommendations were not being made by Dale Gribble (or even Rusty Shackleford). Many of the proponents of such end times advice were in fact highly qualified and diligent experts in their field. Their position was refreshingly unambiguous and really quite shockingly clear. As a result of savage capitalism and insufficient oversight, the chaotic balance of supply chains and available resources had brought the global economy to a point whereby it could only contract. The incessant overselling and leveraging of all assets (including those considered toxic) finally ran out with the sub prime mortgage scandal of 2008. The whole point of futures trading and financial leverage requires sustainable growth. When a crash happens, sustainable growth is just not a thing. Consequently we have become accustomed to periodic quantitative easing and government bail-outs. The US civil service temporarily closing down (on an almost annual basis) is clear evidence that it was becoming impossible to balance the annual discrepancies in the fiscal budget.

The credibility of this particularly challenging advice began to wane as time passed and the world did not appear to be plunged into massive civil unrest. In fact, everything pretty much continued in the same way it had been - until 2019. Entire nations combined their ideological media delivery to force their populations into isolation to prevent the spread of Covid19. This left the majority of people cooped up in their houses, testing their patience and abandoning the social norms they had been practicing for centuries. The cumulative impact of the pandemic on the psyche of the human race can not be underestimated. The issues regarding the Covid delayed children will continue to impact society for the next half a century and probably beyond. People were prevented from gathering in the ways they had naturally developed over millennia. Unofficial community centres in the form of bars and clubs were closed pending vaccine guidelines being written. In every endeavour of humanity, personal contact was aggressively restricted. An unprecedented global campaign to quarantine the healthy was rolled out in almost every single country on planet Earth. Families were divided, relatives were lost and symptoms of social dysfunction peaked as a result. The government partnered with military divisions to combat internet disinformation and many slogans were plastered on many lecterns. Undoubtedly a great number of people really did lose their lives as a result of the pandemic. Additionally a great number of people really did lose their livelihoods and relationships as a result of the pandemic. However possibly the greatest volume of loss can be calculated not in physical terms, but in the esoteric.

There is a new age concept which unashamedly asserts that the world does not operate exclusively according to the material reductionist mentality espoused by The Royal Society. Instead there is an incredibly established network of subtle energy which conveys the highly charged emotional and spiritual output of humanity. Energy which literally keeps everything carrying on along the bumpy terrain of the evolutionary footpath. The sacred geometry seen in the architecture of churches and temples gather the highly charged emotional energy produced within and inject it into the atmosphere through spires, turrets, arches or pagodas. Evidence that subtle energies are not simply woo-woo mumbo jumbo, can be seen in the home heating technologies employed in the architecture of The Gilded Age.

The spires on the corner of houses collected the atmospheric energy and conducted it into the rooms. In the fireplaces of the rooms sat a large copper or brass disc looking similar to a hammered gong. Either side of the disc sat a pair of copper or brass sceptres in much the same way that pokers, brushes and other fire tools do. Everything about the observations of this technology speak to a subtle energy source that was completely free. Being extracted from the ambient field surrounding the house, this subtle energy could not conceivably represent a consumer market which could ever be effectively exploited for profit. Beyond some possible long term anodizing of components, there wouldn't even be any need for a repair based economy, never mind a need for the ongoing consumption of fuel. Unsurprisingly, this technology was ruthlessly suppressed. Today, the sceptres or stands are regularly seen, however the discs are only seen in rare imagery.

Regardless of fossil fuel protectionism, what the Gilded Age heating model accurately demonstrates is that there are irrefutable discrepancies between the nature of our reality and the version of it maintained by established systems of authority. In this murky area of perception versus accepted truth, exists a plethora of mind control methods. Psychological systems designed to reveal certain realities and obfuscate others. We accept many of these control systems as organised religion and many others as the rule of natural law. Humans learned that sanitary conditions were more conducive to healthy communities and consequently many cultures perceive showing the cleaning hand to be a serious insult. The base model of this learned behaviour seems to make some sense.

Danse des Tziganes. Souvenir de

There are also many learned behavioural patterns which (on the face of things) do not make sense. The Roma and other ethnic communities in Eastern Europe use a nod of the head to indicate negative / disagreement and a shake of the head to indicate positive / agreement. This is considered culturally unique in non verbal communication. The dominant theory centres around this widely practiced anomaly being a deliberate social act of counter intelligence, cognitively engaged with on a community wide level to confuse the occupying Ottoman forces. Those who continue the practice today are unlikely to consider it as anything out of the ordinary. Nonetheless the semiotic legacy endures. Every single time someone smiles and shakes their head, a huge metaphorical middle finger is raised against a harsh and dominant occupying force. A foreign force which doesn't even really exist any more in the identity of the local population. Yet the historical subjugation of the Thracian peoples by the Ottomans, caused such misery and suffering that a deliberate campaign of behavioural, passive social resistance endures to this day.

Within the realm of spirituality there are clear indicators of scientific principles which we dismiss as apocrypha. Due to the decrease in evangelical adherence to scripture, critical thinkers are able to examine these indicators and draw parallels with advances in applied scientific research. Religious scholars have intimated that what we accept today as the Hindu faith actually dates back into great antiquity. The icon or totem called the 'Lingum' can be likened to fertility symbolism apparent in practically every culture. The expression in the landscape of a tower, obelisk, menhir, column or flag mast speaks to a celebration and spiritual worship of fertility. Logically enough humans recovering from massive catastrophes such as meteor showers and ice ages need to take fertility quite seriously. Without an ongoing and inherent celebration of life, everyone will die and that's the end of that - again. So don't forget and in case you do, here's a massive great phallus sticking up into the sky to remind you.

Being semi okay-ish at remembering to repeat rituals, the human race did indeed remember to recognise and celebrate fertility in their rituals and the human race gradually learned to avoid extinction - again. At some point this 'sex magic' got hijacked by forces more concerned with control than propagation. Evidence of this exists in the occult practices of various groups, some of which have endured for millennia. From the abhorrent actions of Charles Manson to the abstemious actions of oracles, sadhus, monks and nuns. These groups have taken a divergent path and most of them maintain that their specific (and often dogmatic) interpretation of the spiritual realm requires their separation from the common celebration of fertility. When this is restricted to a minority of the population, people holding these beliefs (and not multiplying) do not threaten the continuation of the human race. In fact many advantages in terms of spiritual advancement have been claimed by such groups and their achievements often support the perception of their cause(s) as benevolent.

However, this self imposed rationing of high energy emotional output is certainly against the greater commitment to fertility, historically practiced all over the planet. With the agricultural revolution, dependence on esoterically fueled fertility decreased. Using the copious amounts of cow manure to fertilise the cornfields meant that going to church and singing your heart out became less important. The crops didn't fail and less people associated church attendance with their tables being graced with the bounty of farm produce. The following over reliance on mineral and petroleum based agricultural management has created substantial negative equity in terms of the production value of farmland.

To generalise, the requirement for regular contributions of high octane emotional energy to keep us all alive has been reduced as a result of technological advances. So far in fact now that there are many who perceive a worldwide reduction in population to be the greatest priority of our species. While there is an abundance of evidence to support this theory, there is also tangible evidence to suggest that those espousing severe population control are not altruists. Furthermore there are repeated instances where similarly obscured mandates have been pursued in the past.

The fallacy of 'peak oil' lead to hysterical over reactions that endured for decades. According to funded research in the 1970's, the worldwide demand for oil would definitely lead to all conceivable wells being exhausted by the end of the millennium. Obviously this was total and utter fear mongering lies. As of 2023, there are oil tankers sitting off the coasts of every major refinery port, nervously waiting for the price of crude to increase so that landing their cargo doesn't bankrupt the shipping operator. The storage costs of oil now apparently exceed the value of the oil being stored. In more recent times there has been much adoption of the 'global warming' trope. The exact specifics of how much mankind has actually impacted on rising temperatures is incalculable. As a result there is once again a substantial disparity in allegiance to the enforced ecological behaviour delivered with the label of combating global warming. Many people are vehemently against the narrative while others nod and accept it.

Starving the Earth of high octane emotional energy can be achieved in many ways. The prohibition of the North Americas stands as a stark example of the active denial of anything remotely resembling Bacchanalia. The Temperance Movement assisted the state as embedded domestic enforcement of this widespread effort to combat excess through intoxication. Many sects of organised religion deny their devotees the right of altering their consciousness and do not practice separation of church and state. This has lead to agenda driven situations such as Emirates Air passengers being served wine with their meal. When they arrive in the Emirates, they have alcohol in their system, which contravenes the religious laws of the state and they can be promptly arrested. Lawyers are hired, hotels are booked, money is spent and the economy benefits. Again there is a viewpoint that the greatest assault is on the esoteric. Couples who have been arrested will be unlikely to exude positivity and celebrate fertility on their first night in the Emirates, if they're even sleeping in the same building. Their entire holiday which was probably anticipated for months, has been completely derailed and will forever be remembered as beginning with a grossly unfair entrapment scam perpetrated with state sanction. If said holiday is actually a constituent part of the ritual surrounding marriage, it represents something akin to an esoteric atom bomb. A weapon of mass destruction being detonated right at the beginning of a holy institution. An institution originally intended to endure for the rest of their lives.

Preventing people from attending contemporary fertility rites in their local temples was deliberately manifested under Covid-19 restrictions. Being unable to attend public gatherings for the purposes of social interaction vastly impacted the populations well-being. A thirty month shutdown in the procreation based habits of humanity will impact every ergonomic facet of life on planet Earth - for centuries. The removal of free thinking conversations in social meeting places emphasised the instruction that 'you can only trust the news bulletins on television'. It's difficult to interpret such concerted actions as anything except further evidence of an organised campaign to erode trust.

There have been many speculative predictions regarding the next world war being fought on the astral plane as opposed to the physical. In many ways it appears that this astral war has actually been ongoing for thousands of years. The banning of church bell ringing under the directions of 'The Reformation' constitutes a quite deliberate and targeted act of astral warfare. One which had rapid and devastating effects on the agricultural environment. Manifested as wide scale crop failures all over Europe. Many of the restrictions imposed on populations during WW2 constitute an open assault on the spiritual well-being of the masses. Preceding the pandemic by only a year or so, long running studies into well-being were being concluded. Distilled into a single concept, their findings could be summarised in the following way:

> Most people want to spend time in the natural world, engaging in social interaction with their friends and family

While this straightforward assertion seems fairly self evident, it comprises the opinions of millions of people. The entire tourism industry pretty much validates this concept. The idea of feeling better as a result of a recent holiday in the sun has become entrenched in lifestyle philosophy over the past century. So much so that sunbed usage has evolved primarily to present the illusion of having recently returned from a carefree, relaxing break from everyday responsibilities.

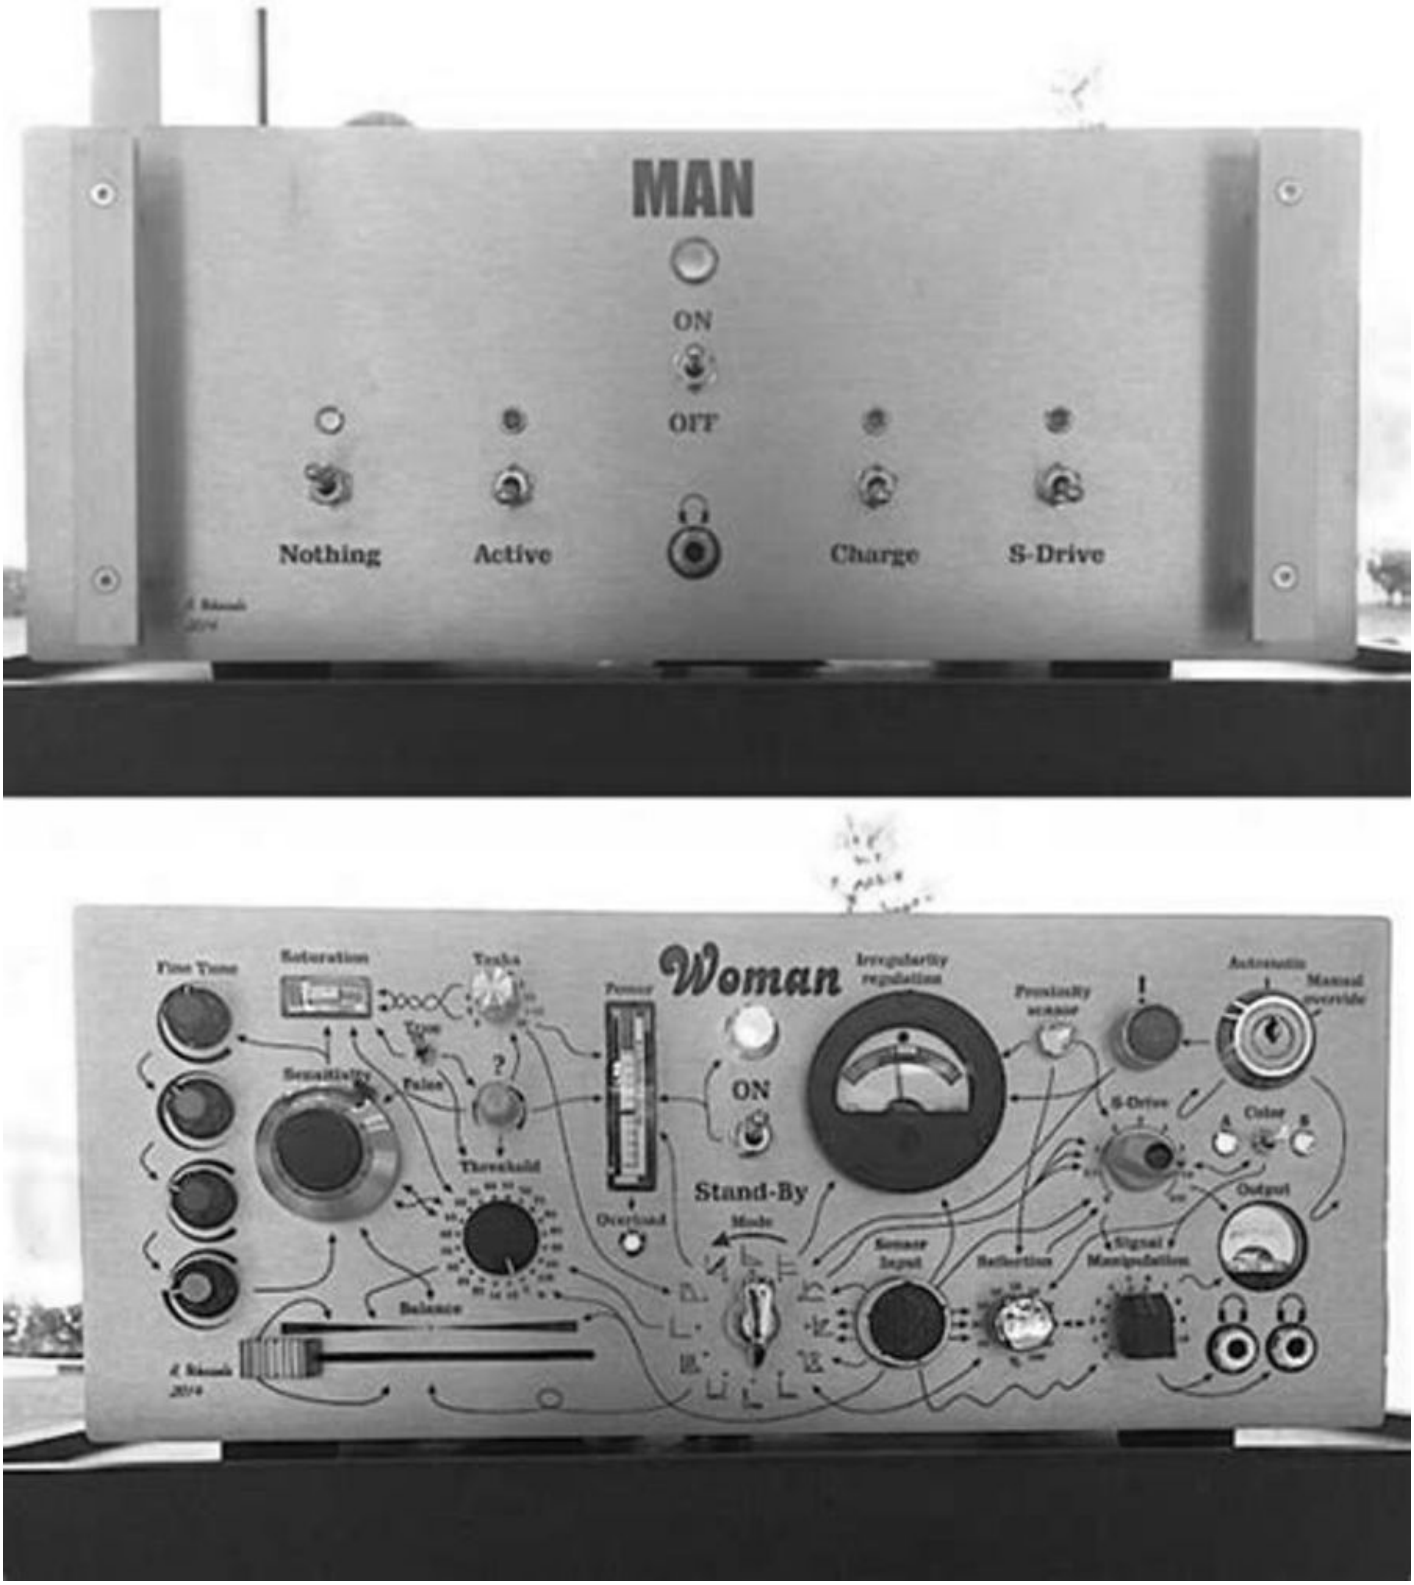

Compare the social concept described above with the delivery of 'public health' recommendations claimed to be for the purposes of controlling the spread of the pandemic. Most of the measures can be considered to actually be in direct opposition to this simple, socially functional desire. An entire community descended on their local beach in Bournemouth in the late spring of 2020. Numbering in the tens of thousands, these curfew escapees snapped on a bank holiday weekend and spontaneously ignored the relentless Covid narrative pouring from their televisions. Sky News presenter Dermot Murnaghan narrated the event as the camera panned across the self governing and socially high functioning vista.

> "Just look at these disturbing scenes..."

It takes some level of cognitive dissonance to survey a crowded beach including thousands of people enjoying themselves and describe it in negative terms. Where does such fervent ideological wrong-think end? By this axiom, parents witnessing their children playing on a seesaw should righteously lambast their offspring for such grotesquely irresponsible behaviour. Really the only sensible thing to do would be to dismantle the seesaw immediately to ensure that no more egregious violations of public health doctrine occur. After all, someone else might see it happening and make use of their convenient informing tool, the infamously badly delivered 'Track and Trace' application installed on their smartphone.

In terms of what inspires otherwise rational individuals into behaving in such blindly ideological ways, the causality seems to stem from a single source. Ultimately the secret societies beneath the visible layers of the population are heavily invested in the restriction of social liberties. Due to the previously mentioned reduction of evangelical religious worship, a rise in materialism has skewed the belief structures of the population. People are now less concerned with the overall well-being of their communities and more concerned with being able to afford a new car next year, a new television next month or a high value mobile phone upgrade at the end of their contract. This has rendered the vast majority of people less susceptible to the pressures of ethical integrity. Going along to get along represents far greater value to the average consumer than taking the morally correct path.

Psychologists generally adhere to the model that the male psyche is more concerned with moral integrity and the female psyche is more concerned with social integrity. Men are broadly speaking more compelled by what is appropriate or represents the 'right thing to do'. Women are broadly speaking more motivated by everyone getting along well. Throughout the history of our species the balance of power in this regard has waxed and waned in favour of both mindsets. Currently we see an unprecedented shift toward the female psyche and the rise of Go along to get along. The clandestine mentality has co-opted the control based aspects of the female psyche and applied the ruthlessness of male psychology to it. Due to a commensurate rise in clandestine mentality being proportionate to the rise in materialism described previously, much of the population are now comfortable with underhand tactics and deception by default. Among their peers it is perceived to just be the way things are.

In addition, this widely accepted tenet of modern psychology maintains that humans require a three way foundation for the maintenance of psychological well being. In order to stay healthy in terms of mental health, humans generally need:

- A job
- A circle of friends
- An intimate relationship

There is an ever present disparity between the stated goals of politicians representing the combined requirements of entire nation states and what the people in these countries actually want. Apparently, the vast majority of the Earths population want the simple rewards of life outdoors with people they care about. Conversely, the desires of professional politicians and control obsessed clandestine types do not fit in with these simple desires. Instead we see the lives of the population being directed and manipulated into creating control mechanisms which only benefit a minimal percentage of the demographic. While this disparity was purely a matter of material resources it was bad enough. Now it seems undeniably apparent that money is not the only objective. We are literally living through a war being waged on the souls of the human race.

A popular description of what actually constitutes the soul of a human being is available in the form of another trifecta of humanity. The soul could be summed up as being represented by:

- The Mind
- The Will
- The Emotion

Each one of these constituent parts has been targeted by social control mechanisms.

- The Mind has been attacked through the endlessly confusing and counter-intuitive directives from the media.
- The Will has been eroded due to being coerced into conformism. With endless promotion of a subservient, herd mentality.
- The Emotion has been assaulted by the steering of opinions. Values which were considered important in times past are now considered outdated. While many of them have changed organically, many have been programmed into the popular consciousness.

Consequently, this has made the vast majority of the global population even more mentally ill than they already were... which was already quite nuts.

Throughout the many decades leading up to our current situation, there has been a consistent and targeted action to control the human race with consent based mind control. The goal has always been part of a multi tiered delivery. If everyone is sitting at home telecommuting, they're easier to keep tabs on and consequently make money from. Both population control and financial control are served by the same process. With the surveillance industry becoming increasingly privatised, a servile population makes for a rich seam of potential targets.
